

Dear FCC Commissioners & Staff:

I have been a subscriber to Iglou Internet Services for over seven years. Iglou is an independent ISP in the Louisville, Kentucky region. I initially subscribed as a dial-up user.

Over the years, my usage and commitment to the internet has grown significantly. Today I use the internet for online banking, investment research, asset management, personal communications, personal learning and growth, exchange of information, and many other areas of my existence.

As my needs grew, Iglou has grown with me. Today I subscribe to their DSL service. I chose to stay with Iglou because their dial-up service was exemplary, their DSL price was competitive, and they didn't require additional undesired bundled services to get a competitive service rate.

Independent Internet service providers such as Iglou offer a valuable asset to their users and the communities in which they serve. They offer choice. They are small enough that my needs and concerns really matter.

Please don't impose the kind of rules and regulations that will smother their existence and ability to compete with the big players.

Thank you for your help in this matter.

Sincerely,

John Link
